Senior Lifestyle Corporation (SLC), one of the nation's largest premier providers of senior care communities, is 'kicking it up a notch' in the culinary department. SLC is known for its high standards in hospitality to enrich its resident's lifestyles. Now, they are sending their chefs off for intense culinary training to learn how to prepare soups, sauces, marinades, salad dressings, and baking breads and desserts from scratch daily.

"We are determined to radically change and improve the quality of dining services in senior living communities," said David Koelling, Vice President of Corporate Services, Senior Lifestyle Corporation. Few companies are willing to take on such an extravagant project during a time when our economy is still rocky from the recession. But, SLC is committed to providing the very best hospitality to enrich the lives of its residents.

According to Brent Wilson, Director, Senior Living, U.S. Foodservice, "Everyone is focused on cutting corners to keep budgets down. It is refreshing to see a senior living company like SLC so dedicated to providing quality dining."

SLC just held its second School of Culinary Arts event at the U.S. Foodservice Culinary Innovation Center (CIC) in suburban Rosemount, IL. U.S. Foodservice is one of the country's premier foodservice distributors, offering more than 43,000 national and signature brand items along with an array of services to its more than 250,000 customers. Senior Lifestyle Corporation and US Foodservice are already planning for future sessions. This program is just part of the newly launched SLC Institute of Hospitality initiative.

Their goal is to provide a daily healthy-eating lifestyle for its residents by combining sound nutritional foods complimented by enticing and creative restaurant quality preparation.

Senior Lifestyle Corporation wants to 'Spice Up' the lives of its senior care community reside is no better means than to pamper them every day with savory, delicious and nutritionally fulfi culinary delights prepared by some of the most skilled chefs in the business.
